About This Game

Can your steam-powered inventions save the ancient Library of Alexandria? Will you sacrifice the library to protect the city? Or will you protect the future king Ptolemy IV instead?

"Choice of Alexandria" is an interactive novella by Kevin Gold, author of "Choice of Robots." Your choices control the story. It's entirely text-based--90,000 words, without graphics or sound effects--and fueled by the vast, unstoppable power of your imagination.

The year is 245 BCE; you're a heroic polymath librarian, invited to Alexandria to tutor prince Ptolemy IV. Coach the prince in the Olympics--or help him ditch the Olympics to show his art and poetry there instead.

Or disregard your tutelage to focus on inventions instead! With the help of Archimedes and Euclid, you can discover the steam engine, the germ theory of disease, or even robotic automata, thousands of years ahead of schedule.

Will you deplete the libraries of other cities to enrich your own? Achieve popularity for your scientific inventions, or protect the legacy of the empire? Will Ptolemy IV grow up hedonistic and selfish, or wise and just? Will you be ransomed by the pirate queen Nefertari, or can you win her over with your silver tongue?

Change the course of history in "Choice of Alexandria!"

- Play as a brilliant inventor, a gifted speaker, or a life-saving doctor

- Make great discoveries while protecting Prince Ptolemy IV from manipulators at court

- Save famed mathematicians Archimedes and Euclid from untimely deaths

- Based on the real life of Eratosthenes, ancient genius who calculated the size of the Earth

- Save the Great Library and invent the steam engine two thousand years early!

Choice of Alexandria

"Well, if it isn't the librarian." You turn and see that Nefertari is exploring the palace with two Egyptian swordsmen as guards. The Egyptian woman is wearing a priestess's garb and copious amounts of jewelry. "How do you like the revolution I engineered?"

"What are you doing here in the palace?" you ask.

"I am looking for those who would be loyal to me in a new regime, and killing the rest," Nefertari says. "How about it? Would you be willing to serve me as Head Librarian?"

- ● "Very well, I will serve you as Head Librarian."
- ○ I agree to help, but then attempt to kill Nefertari at the earliest opportunity.
- ○ I try to convince Nefertari to call off the attack.

"Which brings me to my question to you, O wise tutor of my eldest son." Berenice gestures expansively to Alexandria, across the lake. "The city knows I killed Demetrius. My son does not. We have managed to keep him ignorant of this fact about me, partly by keeping him from his peers. No doubt every thirteen-year-old boy in Alexandria would love to inform my boy about my past in the most insulting way possible. So instead, we keep him in the company of those who know better than to tell him such things, such as you and Sosibius."

You blink for a moment, trying to consider the ramifications of this conspiracy to keep Ptolemy in the company of people who would not tell him the truth. "And you want to know whether it's time to let young Ptolemy know about your past."

Berenice grins. "Precisely. I knew you were a sharp one, librarian."

- ● "Yes, you should let him know your husband died because of his lechery."
- ○ "Yes, you should let him know that even great heroines must sometimes take actions others deplore."
- ○ "No, don't tell him now. I can write your story for him to read later."

Another great story with an interesting and historic background. It could stand to be a bit longer, but regardless, I found it quite enjoyable. Overall I would give it an 8\/10.
